About Journalism Workbench

Journalism Workbench is an evidence-first investigative research platform. It exists for reporters who need to track entities, relationships, money flows, and sourced claims through an investigation -- and be able to show their work, not just their conclusions.

What makes this different

Provenance that survives editing

Every extracted entity, claim, and relationship keeps a lineage back to the document, chunk, and review decision that produced it -- so a fact can always be traced to its source, not just asserted.

A verification workflow, not a wiki

Claims move through explicit states with evidence attached at each step. This is built around how investigative reporting is actually checked, not a generic notes app repurposed for it.

Relationship graphs grounded in FollowTheMoney

Money flows and entity relationships use an interoperable schema, so findings can be cross-checked against, or exported to, the broader investigative-data ecosystem rather than staying locked in this tool.

Leads with triage built in

Leads carry stance counts, disputed-claim counts, and an attention score automatically, so a newsroom can see what needs a second look without re-reading every thread by hand.
